The Maoist Revival and the Conservative Turn in Chinese Politics

WILLY LAM

ABSTRACT: This paper evaluates the revival of Maoism in China as major factions of the Chinese Communist Party take a conservative turn in ideology and politics. While the changhong (“singing red songs”) campaign spearheaded by the ousted party chief of Chongqing, Bo Xilai, has attracted the most attention in and outside of China, power blocs ranging from the Communist Youth League Faction under President Hu Jintao to the Gang of Princelings headed by Vice-President Xi Jinping have also resuscitated different aspects of the teachings and values associated with the Great Helmsman. For this reason, the political demise of Bo does not mean the cessation of the revive-Maoism phenomenon. This study also assesses the impact of the restoration of Maoist norms on aspects of Chinese politics such as the future of political reform.

KEYWORDS: Maoism, conservatism, dissent, princelings, political reform.

Introduction and synopsis

According to former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev’s mid-2011 interview with the BBC, Nikita Khrushchev’s 1956 denunciation of Stalin had a pivotal impact on his new thinking, including the germination of the ideas of perestroika and glasnost. Yet in China, nobody – and no political force – has the guts, integrity, and vision to publicly unmask and denounce Chairman Mao Zedong, who many believe to have been responsible for more deaths than Stalin.

Since the Cultural Revolution, the closest that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) authorities have come to evaluating the mistakes of Mao Zedong is the famous Resolution on Certain Historical Questions of the CCP since the Establishment of the People’s Republic (hereafter Resolution), which was passed by the CCP Central Committee in 1981 under the close supervision of Deng Xiaoping. The Resolution pointed out unequivocally that Mao’s “contributions to the Chinese revolution far outweighed his shortcomings” and that “his contributions were primary, his mistakes secondary.” Moreover, the document’s criticisms of Mao centred on tactical issues, mainly errors of judgment during the Cultural Revolution. Not one word was devoted to the irrational and non-democratic nature of Maoism or to Mao’s feudalistic governance. As Deng said at the time: “We must affirm the historical position of comrade Mao Zedong, and uphold and develop Mao Thought. We must hoist high the flag of Mao Thought not only today but in the future.” Fourth-Generation leader President Hu Jintao was equally effusive in eulogising the demigod. In a speech marking the Great Helmsman’s 110th birthday in late 2003, he declared Mao to be a “great proletarian revolutionary strategist and theorist.” While Deng at least cited “leftist” errors committed by Mao, Hu’s hagiographic address made no mention of his manifold blunders.

This paper studies the background and significance of the Maoist revival that began in Chongqing in late 2008 – and which spread across the nation in the ensuing years. On 15 March 2012, Bo Xilai, the main progenitor of the crypto-Maoist revival, was relieved of his position as Chongqing Party secretary. Soon afterwards, his membership in the Politburo and Central Committee was suspended. There is no indication, however, that the resurrection of Maoist norms has been halted due to Bo’s downfall. What, then, are the factors behind the quasi-Maoist renaissance, which has manifested itself in phenomena and campaigns ranging from changhong (singing red songs) to the apparently new fad of constructing a “red GDP”? The relationship between the rekindling of Maoist norms and the Hu Jintao leadership’s top agenda of upholding political stability is examined. Also discussed are the factional dynamics behind the re-hoisting of Maoist banners. For example, are the princelings – who seemed to be at the forefront of the political movement – singing Mao’s praises so as to consolidate the political fortune of the so-called Gang of Princelings? The policy implications of changhong and other Maoist rituals are also studied. This paper will also look at the significance of the restitution of Maoism particularly with reference to the party’s potentials for reform after the pivotal 18th CCP Congress of late 2012.

The genesis and major contours of the Maoist restoration

Revival of Maoist statues, “red songs,” and Maoist quotations

The revival of Maoism started in 2008 and culminated in festivities surrounding the 90th birthday of the CCP on 1 July 2011. The epicentre of the revitalisation of Maoist norms is the western metropolis of Chongqing, which became the base of then-Party secretary Bo Xilai when the ambitious and charismatic son of Party elder Bo Yibo (1908-2007) was transferred there in late 2007. Mao statues – which were feverishly torn down all over China soon after late patriarch Deng Xiaoping initiated the reform era in 1978 – were put up again by government offices, factories, and universities in this city of 34 million people. A newly constructed seven-story statue of 62-meter-tall stainless steel statue of Mao Zedong at Chongqing Medical University in Chongqing.

Top: The 20.6-meter-tall stainless steel statue of Mao Zedong at Chongqing Medical University in Chongqing.

Bottom: Mao Zedong youth art sculpture, Changsha.

Credits: Zhong Guolin, Imaginechina.

Bottom: Mao Zedong youth art sculpture, Changsha.

Credits: Huang Dan/Wikimedia.

The demigod in Chongqing’s college district dwarfed nearby halls, libraries, and classroom buildings. The Maoist fever soon spread elsewhere. Not far from the Helmsman’s birthplace in the middle of Xiangjiang River in Changsha, Hunan Province, the latest tourist attraction was a sky-scraping, 32-meter torso of the young Mao. Moreover, the long-forgotten slogan “Long Live Mao Zedong Thought” was resuscitated in October 2009 after banners bearing this battle cry were held high by college students and nationalistic Beijing residents during parades in Tiananmen Square that marked the 60th birthday of the People’s Republic.

Yet the most vivid – and telling – symbol of the restitution of Maoist standards is the changhong (literally, “singing red songs”) campaign, which had become a near-universal phenomenon in the run-up to the 1 July 2011 celebration of the Party’s 90th birthday. Song-and-dance troupes that specialised in red songs, whose participants ranged from high-school students to retirees, were sprouting like bamboo shoots in the spring. Bo, a high-profile princeling (a reference to the offspring of party elders), asked all residents to learn by heart 36 Mao-era “revolutionary songs.” Radio and TV stations nationwide broadcast these “red ditties” – which lauded the larger-than-life exploits of national heroes and “proletariat paragons” – at regular intervals. The 62-year-old Bo was also adept at using the new media to spread his “red” messages. He often asked his assistants to text-message sayings by Mao to the city’s Netizens. Bo’s favourite Mao quotations included: “The world is ours; we must all take part in running [public] affairs”; “Human beings need to have [a revolutionary] spirit”; “The world belongs to young people. They are like the sun at eight or nine in the morning”; and “Once the political line has been settled, [the quality of] cadres is the deciding factor.”

The Cultural Revolution-era practice of dispatching students to the countryside to “learn from the masses” was revived, first in Chongqing and then in other cities. Nationwide, millions of Chinese flocked to “revolutionary bases” such as Yan’an, Jinggangshan, and Shaoshan, the birthplace of the Great Helmsman. Most importantly, the re-hoisting of Maoist standards has signified a conservative turn in Chinese statecraft. Repeated appeals have been made by ideological and propaganda departments to Party members and college students to steep themselves in the works of Mao and the related Marxist canon. Such exhortations are much more emphatically made than, for example, similar calls issued by ex-president Jiang Zemin during his so-called san jiang or “Three Emphases” campaign in the early

Top: The 20.6-meter-tall stainless steel statue of Mao Zedong at Chongqing Medical University in Chongqing.

Bottom: Mao Zedong youth art sculpture, Changsha.

Credits: Zhong Guolin, Imaginechina.

Bottom: Mao Zedong youth art sculpture, Changsha.

Credits: Huang Dan/Wikimedia.

which became the base of then-Party secretary Bo Xilai when the ambitious and charismatic son of Party elder Bo Yibo (1908-2007) was transferred there in late 2007. Mao statues – which were feverishly torn down all over China soon after late patriarch Deng Xiaoping initiated the reform era in 1978 – were put up again by government offices, factories, and universities in this city of 34 million people. A newly constructed seven-story statue of

The meaning of the Maoist revival and changhong movement

What exactly lies behind the Maoist resurgence? "Some people say we are going 'left,' and that we are returning to the period of the 'Cultural Revolution,'" Bo said in mid-2011. "This is totally groundless." According to the Deputy Director of the CCP Propaganda Department, Wang Xiaohui, changhong and related rituals "have nothing to do with the national ideology and psyche moving to the left or to the right." Wang claimed that while changhong activities proved to be popular, there were also large numbers of Chinese who favoured popular music and even rock and roll. The reality, however, is that there was a self-conscious effort by the CCP authorities to introduce policies that will do the Great Helmsman — and his fervent fans — proud.

A paean to patriotism — and loyalty to CCP orthodoxy

At the very least, the Maoist revival is a salvo toward promoting "spiritual civilisation," a concept that was raised by Deng Xiaoping to counter the materialism that would come in the wake of the country's market reforms and accumulation of wealth. As then-Party secretary Bo said, "Singing the praise of 'redness' means supporting what is right." A city must do a good job of nurturing spiritual civilisation," he added. Bo indicated that cadres who are obsessed with GDP rates — but who lack spiritual values — may "go down the road of corruption and degeneration." For most Chinese ideologues and officials, a key part of spiritual civilisation is stirring up patriotic — nationalistic — pride. As Bo put it, changhong is equivalent to "a theoretical foundation for finding one's roots in history, the return of ideals, the revival of [the Chinese] race, and the rise of the nation." And since, according to long-standing orthodoxy, it is the CCP that has made possible the advancement of China, changhong also means singing the praises of the CCP.

Apart from changhong, aficionados also "read [red classics], tell [red] stories, and pass along[ orthodox] axioms." Again according to Bo, most of these songs, classics, stories, and axioms have to do with "saving the country [from the brink of collapse], nation-building, and constructing a strong and prosperous China." Songs featured in changhong concerts nationwide included well-known ditties popularised during the anti-Japanese war of 1937–1945, as well as songs from the 1950s and 1960s. Among them were March of the Volunteers (which doubles as the national anthem); March of the Big Knives and Protecting the Yellow River (both anti-Japanese songs); Sing a Song about the Motherland, Song of Lei Feng, and the more contemporary My Chinese Heart. Very often the singing sessions ended with the de rigueur There Won't Be a New China Without the Chinese Communist Party. When we sing My Chinese Heart, we are demonstrating the cohesiveness, the centripetal tendency of the Chinese race," Bo noted. "We must unambiguously uphold artistic works that can hold tight the hearts of the people, and that are healthy and righteous." "Reformist tourism" — which is yet another offshoot of the revitalisation of Maoism — also carries immense symbolic significance. According to Vice-President Xi, who has toured most of the "red" shrines in provinces including Hunan, Jiangxi, and Shaanxi, meccas like Shaoshan, the birthplace of Mao, are "resources of revolutionary tradition" and "valuable spiritual treasures of our party." "Red tourist spots are a vivid classroom for studying the tradition and learning new things," he said while touring Shaoshan in early 2011. "They contain rich political wisdom and moral nutrients." Even though Bo’s "red campaign" never got any official imprimatur from top central Party organs such as thePolitburo or its Standing Committee, a number of Politburo Standing Committee (PBSC) and Politburo members began visiting Chongqing in the second half of 2010 to show their support for this conservative crusade. These top cadres included Wu Bangguo, Zhou Yongkang, Xi Jinping, and Li Yuanchao. The official Xinhua News Agency quoted Vice-President Xi, who toured Chongqing in December 2010, as "affirming the practice of singing red songs and studying [Maoist] classics... as a means of pursuing education in [Marxist] ideals and beliefs." Li, who is a Politburo member and Director of the CCP Organisation Department, did not give an excessively ideological interpretation of the changhong fad during his trip to Chongqing. He nevertheless agreed that reinstating the "red" tradition was a laudatory patriotic experience. While in Chongqing in April 2011, Li joined Bo in a changhong concert. Li said that changhong activities were "conducive to propagating a [morally] uplifting social atmosphere." A large quantity of ‘people’s songs’ that reflected the heart and soul of the people emerged during the times of the revolution, the war, and the construction of the New China," Li said. "We must all sing these good songs together." Given that Li is a protégé of President Hu and a senior member of the supreme’s Communist Youth League Faction, this was clear-cut proof that many of the values behind Bo’s Maoism-related activities were shared by other cliques in the CCP.

Indeed, many Chinese remember Mao as the larger-than-life founder of the Republic and the "pride of the Chinese race." The contributions of Mao were played up in the blockbuster movie The Founding of a Republic, which was specially commissioned by Party authorities to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the establishment of the People’s Republic of China. Central Party

11. For a discussion of the san jiang or ‘Three Emphases’ Campaign (“emphasis on studying [the Maoist canon], on politics, and on righteousness”), which Jiang Zemin started in 1995, see “Jiang Zemin: Putting emphasis on studies, on politics and on righteousness (1995),” www.BKPCN.com, 25 December 2008, http://cpc.people.com.cn/GB/338387/2535045.html (consulted on 3 March 2012). It should be noted, however, that when Jiang asked Party members to study the Maoist canon, there was no specific effort to revive Maoist norms and practices.

14. According to the Xinhua News Agency, quoted Vice-President Xi, who toured Chongqing in December 2010, as “affirming the practice of singing red songs and studying [Maoist] classics... as a means of pursuing education in [Marxist] ideals and beliefs.”

16. According to the Xinhua News Agency, quoted Vice-President Xi, who toured Chongqing in December 2010, as “affirming the practice of singing red songs and studying [Maoist] classics... as a means of pursuing education in [Marxist] ideals and beliefs.”

21. For an explanation of the significance of the film The Founding of a Republic, see, for example, “When we sing My Chinese Heart, we are demonstrating the cohesiveness, the centripetal tendency of the Chinese race,” Bo noted. "We must unambiguously uphold artistic works that can hold tight the hearts of the people, and that are healthy and righteous." "Reformist tourism" — which is yet another offshoot of the revitalisation of Maoism — also carries immense symbolic significance. According to Vice-President Xi, who has toured most of the “red” shrines in provinces including Hunan, Jiangxi, and Shaanxi, meccas like Shaoshan, the birthplace of Mao, are “resources of revolutionary tradition” and “valuable spiritual treasures of our party.” "Red tourist spots are a vivid classroom for studying the tradition and learning new things," he said while touring Shaoshan in early 2011. “They contain rich political wisdom and moral nutrients.”

School theorist Li Junru, who first gained fame for his exposition of Deng’s reform programs, characterised Mao as a titan who “led the Chinese people in their struggle against the reactionary rule of imperialism and feudalism, so that the Chinese race [could] stand tall among the people of the world.”[24] Moreover, according to conservative theoretician Peng Xiaoguang, the enduring enthusiasm for Mao Zedong Thought, particularly among the young, testified to the intelligentsia’s search for an “ultimate faith that could speed up China’s rise in the wake of the global financial crisis.”[24]

It was Zhang Quanjing, a former Director of the CCP Organisation Department, who perhaps gave the most eloquent explanation of the relevance of Maoism to twenty-first century China. In a 2011 article entitled “We Must Unswervingly Continue to Uphold Mao Thought,” Zhang said the Great Helmsman’s ideas consisted of the “paradigm of synthesising Marxism-Leninism and revolution and construction in China.” “Mao Thought has incorporated the wisdom of China and the world during different historical periods,” Zhang asserted. In areas including ideology, military affairs, politics, economics, culture, technology, and sports, the ideologue indicated, Maoism was “the crystallisation of the intelligence of the whole party and all Chinese.”[25]

Celebrating red GDP and egalitarianism

There is also a “materialistic” side to the Maoist revival: a re-emphasis on the values of egalitarianism and social equality that a sizeable sector of the population associates with the Maoist era. This was also a reaction to the increasing polarisation of rich and poor – and the increasing stratification of Chinese society based on money and privilege – that was regarded as a result of 30-odd years of Deng Xiaoping-style reform. The spectre of “class antagonism” was exacerbated by Jiang Zemin’s decision in 2001 to allow private entrepreneurs, professionals, and members of the middle-classes into the CCP. This has resulted in the social downgrading of the “lower classes” of workers and peasants, who used to be pillars of the Party.[26]

One of the key factors behind the so-called “scientific theory of development” of the Hu-Wen administration is to rectify many of the ill effects of Deng and Jiang’s policies. There is significant measure of neo-Maoism behind such of Hu’s slogans as “putting people first.” By the late 2000s, however, it had become clear that the rich-poor gap – as well as the discrepancies between east and west China – was yawning wider and wider.[27] Bo apparently seized the opportunity to revive a kind of crypto-Maoist “red GDP,” a supposedly non-exploitative growth model that would be populist and, in a way, egalitarian. As Bo put it: “The most important basis of a harmonious society is winning the hearts of the people.”[28]

Red GDP is a codeword for economic development that is geared toward the needs of the masses – and not dictated by the greed of privileged classes such as the country’s estimated 30 million millionaires.[29] For example, while real estate prices in cities ranging from Shanghai to Shenzhen were rated the wisdom of China and the world during different historical periods,” Zhejiang Asserted. In areas including ideology, military affairs, politics, economics, culture, technology, and sports, the ideologue indicated, Maoism was “the crystallisation of the intelligence of the whole party and all Chinese.”[25]

There are critics galore, however, who think that Bo’s so-called red GDP concept is but a regurgitation of bits and pieces of the Hu-Wen administration. One of the key factors behind the so-called “scientific theory of development” of the Hu-Wen administration is to rectify many of the ill effects of Deng and Jiang’s policies. There is significant measure of neo-Maoism behind such of Hu’s slogans as “putting people first.” By the late 2000s, however, it had become clear that the rich-poor gap – as well as the discrepancies between east and west China – was yawning wider and wider.[27] Bo apparently seized the opportunity to revive a kind of crypto-Maoist “red GDP,” a supposedly non-exploitative growth model that would be populist and, in a way, egalitarian. As Bo put it: “The most important basis of a harmonious society is winning the hearts of the people.”[28]

Red GDP is a codeword for economic development that is geared toward the needs of the masses – and not dictated by the greed of privileged classes such as the country’s estimated 30 million millionaires.[29] For example, while real estate prices in cities ranging from Shanghai to Shenzhen were going through the roof, Chongqing cadres pledged to ensure that at least one third of all apartments in the metropolis were affordable to workers and farmers. For instance, Chongqing has been hailed as a pioneer in providing so-called “social security housing,” or subsidised flats for the lower classes.[30] This idea was picked up in the 12th Five Year Plan (2011 to 2015), in which the Wen cabinet pledged that more than 36 million units of social security housing would be provided nationwide during these five years.[31]

Chongqing has also attracted nationwide attention for its experiment in the partial solution of the hukou (residence permit) system – which has since the 1950s prevented rural-born Chinese from moving to and settling in the cities. Urban-rural segregation is set to be abolished within the municipality by the mid-2010s, when all Chongqing residents can live and work within the confines of the municipality.[32] Yet Bo’s most attention-grabbing policy was his crusade against the triads (or Chinese mafia) – the so-called dahei (“strike the dark forces”) campaign – in 2009. Within a period of six months, Chongqing police arrested 24 big-time crime bosses, who coughed up 1.7 billion yuan of ill-gotten gains. In addition, more than 200 mid-to-high-ranking officials in Chongqing’s law-enforcement and judicial departments were nabbed for taking bribes from criminals. These bad apples included the former head of the Chongqing Judicial Bureau, Wen Qiang. Wen, who is also a former police chief, admitted to taking bribes and gifts totalling nearly 100 million yuan.[33]

In addition, Bo sought to placate the petitioners – “lower-class” Chinese who want to present senior officials with their grievances – by asking some 200,000 municipal employees to regularly meet with residents who claim to be victims of bureaucratic and other forms of injustices.[34] Bo and the Chongqing mayor, the master bureaucratic fixer Huang Qifan, indicated that the key to the CCP maintaining its perennial ruling-party status was “whether it is tightly linked with the people and the masses.” “Chairman Mao put it best: we must serve the people with all our hearts and minds,” Bo noted. “The party will become impregnable if cadres from top to bottom are tightly bonded with the masses”[35]

There are critics galore, however, who think that Bo’s so-called red GDP concept is but a regurgitation of bits and pieces of the Hu-Wen administration. One of the key factors behind the so-called “scientific theory of development” of the Hu-Wen administration is to rectify many of the ill effects of Deng and Jiang’s policies. There is significant measure of neo-Maoism behind such of Hu’s slogans as “putting people first.” By the late 2000s, however, it had become clear that the rich-poor gap – as well as the discrepancies between east and west China – was yawning wider and wider.[27] Bo apparently seized the opportunity to revive a kind of crypto-Maoist “red GDP,” a supposedly non-exploitative growth model that would be populist and, in a way, egalitarian. As Bo put it: “The most important basis of a harmonious society is winning the hearts of the people.”[28]

Red GDP is a codeword for economic development that is geared toward the needs of the masses – and not dictated by the greed of privileged classes such as the country’s estimated 30 million millionaires.[29] For example, while real estate prices in cities ranging from Shanghai to Shenzhen were going through the roof, Chongqing cadres pledged to ensure that at least one third of all apartments in the metropolis were affordable to workers and farmers. For instance, Chongqing has been hailed as a pioneer in providing so-called “social security housing,” or subsidised flats for the lower classes.[30] This idea was picked up in the 12th Five Year Plan (2011 to 2015), in which the Wen cabinet pledged that more than 36 million units of social security housing would be provided nationwide during these five years.[31]

Chongqing has also attracted nationwide attention for its experiment in the partial solution of the hukou (residence permit) system – which has since the 1950s prevented rural-born Chinese from moving to and settling in the cities. Urban-rural segregation is set to be abolished within the municipality by the mid-2010s, when all Chongqing residents can live and work within the confines of the municipality.[32] Yet Bo’s most attention-grabbing policy was his crusade against the triads (or Chinese mafia) – the so-called dahei (“strike the dark forces”) campaign – in 2009. Within a period of six months, Chongqing police arrested 24 big-time crime bosses, who coughed up 1.7 billion yuan of ill-gotten gains. In addition, more than 200 mid-to-high-ranking officials in Chongqing’s law-enforcement and judicial departments were nabbed for taking bribes from criminals. These bad apples included the former head of the Chongqing Judicial Bureau, Wen Qiang. Wen, who is also a former police chief, admitted to taking bribes and gifts totalling nearly 100 million yuan.[33]

In addition, Bo sought to placate the petitioners – “lower-class” Chinese who want to present senior officials with their grievances – by asking some 200,000 municipal employees to regularly meet with residents who claim to be victims of bureaucratic and other forms of injustices.[34] Bo and the Chongqing mayor, the master bureaucratic fixer Huang Qifan, indicated that the key to the CCP maintaining its perennial ruling-party status was “whether it is tightly linked with the people and the masses.” “Chairman Mao put it best: we must serve the people with all our hearts and minds,” Bo noted. “The party will become impregnable if cadres from top to bottom are tightly bonded with the masses”[35]
tion’s “scientific theory of development.” Several central and provincial cadres had as early as 2008 propagated concepts including “attaining GDP without blood” or “green GDP.” [40] Appeals to a more egalitarian society have also repeatedly been made by Premier Wen, who said famously at a National People’s Congress (NPC) conference in 2010 that “social equality and justice should shine even brighter than the sun.” Moreover, one of the earlier pioneers of social-security housing was PBSC member and Hu Jintao protégé Li Keqiang when he was Party Secretary of Liaoqing Province from 2004 to 2007. [41] Ironically, Bo had neglected the issue of housing for the poor when he was governor of Liaoqing from 2001 to 2004. However, the charismatic princeling’s ability to generate publicity – and to garner plaudits – by repackaging others’ ideas as his own certainly testified to his political skills. This also demonstrates that talk about egalitarianism and social justice by the crypto-Maoists was often a public-relations exercise geared toward boosting the political fortunes of individual cadres.

Deeper-level factors behind the Maoist revival

On a deeper level, the quasi-Maoist renaissance is a political movement undertaken by the CCP leadership to uphold political stability and weed out challenges to the regime. Factional dynamics is also involved. The Party’s much-attenuated liberal wing – which consists of the remnant followers of the late titans Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang – has been dealt a body blow. And the taizidang or Gang of Princelings, of which Bo is a well-known leader, is cynically using the changhong crusade to enhance the political fortunes of cadres with “revolutionary bloodlines.”

The mainstream factions’ views about the Maoist restoration

A perennial problem for the post-Cultural Revolution mainstream ruling factions – including the Deng Xiaoping Faction, the Shanghai Faction led by ex-president Jiang Zemin, and the Communist Youth League (CYL) Faction headed by President Hu Jintao – is how to strike a balance between leftist (ultra-radical crypto-Maoists) on the one hand, and rightists (pro-West liberals) on the other. The leftists fully acknowledge the precept of one-party dictatorship under the CCP, but they are opposed to market-oriented reforms begun by Deng Xiaoping in the late 1970s – and followed by Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao – especially privatisation and China’s integration with the global marketplace. Leftists, who are also called the New Leftists, is cynically using the changhong crusade to enhance the political fortunes of cadres with “revolutionary bloodlines.”

36. Regional cadres such as Guangdong Party Secretary Wang Yang and Shanxi Party Secretary Zhang Baoshun indicated as early as 2008 that they did not want to achieve “GDP that is tainted with blood.” See, for example, “Zhao Baoshun: We resolutely do not want GDP that is tainted with pollution and blood,” People’s Daily Internet Edition, 17 October 2010, http://leaders.people.com.cn/G8/8188892.html (consulted on 3 March 2012).

40. For a discussion of the Hu leadership’s measures to uphold political stability, see, for example, Willy Lam, “Beijing’s blueprint for tackling mass incidents and social management,” China Brief, 25 March 2011, www.jamestown.org/single/?no_cache=1&tx_ttnews%5Btt_news%5D=13769 (consulted on 3 March 2012).

Era of Reform. The supremo vowed that the CCP would uphold the “Four Cardinal Principles” of stern party control – and that the government would do whatever it took to “boost its ability to guard against changes [to a capitalistic system] and to withstand risks” such as socio-political instability. Hu also delivered a stern warning to liberal cadres who favoured the adoption of at least some form of international values such as elections and the rule of law. The CCP, he said, “will never take the deviant path of changing the flag and standard [of party orthodoxy].”

Hu’s message has been repeated by top officials such as NPC Chairman Wu Bangguo and Chen Kuiyuan of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (CASS). In March 2011, Wu shocked even Chinese intellectuals by enunciating his “Five Nos” principle, including the fact that the CCP would never “under-take the diversification of [the Party’s] guiding principle.” In a major article released at about the same time, CASS’s Chen pointed out that the CCP and all Chinese can only follow one principle: Marxism. All CCP members must “believe in Marxism and be resolute Marxists,” he said. “Both the party charter and the Constitution have clearly stipulated that Marxist theory is the theoretical basis of the guiding principle of our party and state,” he said.

“Marxism,” of course, is an ominous term that incorporates allied creeds such as Leninism and Mao Zedong Thought; all of which are part of the sacrosanct “Four Cardinal Principles.” As Chen said, “we have to study the theoretical system of socialism with Chinese characteristics; we have to synthesise the study of Marxism, Leninism, and Mao Zedong Thought.”

Supremo-in-waiting Xi Jinping (who is the son of former vice-premier Xi Zhongxun) has also played a sizeable role in the propagation of the yiquanj-hua or monolithic approach to ideology. Since becoming President of the CCP Central Party School (CCPCPS) in 2007, he has been stepping up old-style Marxist – and Maoist – indoctrination. For example, at the opening of a CPS semester in April 2011, Xi urged students to “pay attention to the Marxist canon,” especially Mao’s classic writings. “Cadres must seriously study Marxist theory to ensure that they can maintain political resolution,” he said. Xi added that since Marxist classics were voluminous, “we should focus on the salient points, and concentrate on studying the quintessence – particularly the important works of Mao Zedong.”

Indeed, the heir-apparent to Hu likes to sprinkle his homilies to CCPCPS students with Mao’s words of wisdom. Xi’s repeated emphasis on recruiting and grooming neophytes who are “both politically upright and professionally competent” echoes Mao’s dictum on picking officials who are “both red and expert.” While talking about “party construction,” or ways to ensure the ideological purity of CCP cells, Xi noted that the leadership must learn from the “great party-construction engineering project that was successfully pioneered by the First-Generation leadership with comrade Mao Zedong as its core.” When he was touring the provinces, Xi liked to celebrate “proletariat paragons” first lionised by Chairman Mao. Thus, while inspecting the Daqing Oilfield in Heilongjiang Province in late 2009, the vice-president eulogised the “spirit of the Iron Man of Daqing,” a reference to the well-nigh super-human exploits of Wang Jinxi, the legendary oilfield worker. Xi has also heaped praise on “heroes of the masses” such as the self-sacrificing fire fighter Lei Feng and the altruistic county Party secretary Jiao Yulu.

While Hu seldom talks about Maoism, he has been vigorously propagating strait-laced orthodoxy and uniformity of thought through the campaign of “Sinicising and popularising Marxism.” As far back as 2006, Hu earmarked more than $10 million to set up a new Marxism-Leninism Academy. Its function was to churn out up-to-date – and Sinicised – works of Marxism.

At a 2010 forum on “promoting popular contemporary Chinese Marxism,” Director of the CCP Propaganda Department Liu Yunshan pointed out that cadres should “deeply grasp the laws of Marxist development, and better arm the entire party – and educate the people – with the theoretical system of Chinese socialism.” “We must take hold of the people through better [use of] the latest fruits of the Sinicisation of Marxism,” said Liu, a conservative commissar who often acts as Hu’s spokesman.

Using Maoism to hit out at “rightist” intellectuals

The Maoist campaign has also constituted a potent attack on efforts by the Party’s much-weakened liberal faction – and intellectuals in general – to spread Western or international values. It is not surprising that Wen Dao and Ning Yunhua, both frequent contributors to the leftist Utopia website (wyyxsx.com),[52] the Maoist camp’s main Net vehicle, characterised the changhong campaign thus: “These red songs, soaked with the bright red blood of revolutionary martyrs, are the spiritual medicine people need to free themselves of the poison of Western class society and spiritual opium.”

The partial restoration of Maoist practices has thrown light on the perennial struggle between crypto-Maoist conservatives and pro-West intellectuals. Take, for example, the ferocious ideological battle between a group of liberal intellectuals led by Mao Yushi and Xin Ziling on the one hand, and the New Left, or quasi-Maoists, represented by the Utopia website on the other. Xin, a rebel intellectual who served in the PLA, published his The Fall of the Red Sun in early 2011. The book, which chronicled Mao’s horrendous blunders, is in some ways comparable to the best-selling tome Mao, the Untold Story written by Jung Chang and Jon Halliday. In his review of Red Sun, the well-known economist Mao Yushi (not related to the Great Helmsman) wrote: “Since [Mao] was not a god, he will be removed from the altar, divested of all the myth that used to shroud him, and receive a just evaluation as an ordinary human being.”

52. The website Utopia was closed down in early April following the removal of Bo Xilai from his post. See “China shuts down Maoist website Utopia,” The Guardian, 6 April 2012, www. guardian.co.uk/world/2012/apr/06/china-maoist-website-utopia (consulted on 8 May 2012).

55. Ibid; see also Ed Zhang, “Rising resentment at the mass campaign to spread red songs,” South China Morning Post, 3 July 2011.
Using Maoist tactics against dissidents – and the rapid deterioration of rule of law

Gradually but inevitably, China has taken on the traits of a police state. Human rights conditions have deteriorated even as the law-enforcement apparatus is committed to “nipping all destabilising forces in the bud.” In the days of Jiang Zemin, the police and state-security personnel just locked up dissidents; in the past few years, they have even incarcerated the spouses and close relatives of public intellectuals such as Nobel Laureate Liu Xiaobo. Even after a human-rights lawyer or NGO activist such as Gao Zhisheng is released, he or she is still subject to either house arrest or 24-hour surveillance. The Hu administration’s determination to emasculate all potential sources of opposition, which include NGOs and the media – was reflected in the budget allocated for the purpose of wei-wen or “upholding stability.” In 2012, the NPC approved outlays worth US$11.4 billion for public-security departments. In comparison, the PLA budget was only $106.5 billion. This was the second time in a row that wei-wen expenditures exceeded those of the military. Regional wei-wen budgets for provinces and cities including Liaoning, Guangdong, Beijing, and Suzhou also went up by an annual average rate of at least 15 percent in the late 2000s.

Maoism – and Mao’s well-recorded penchant for mercilessly smashing all opposition – has provided perhaps the best justification for this scorched-earth policy toward dissent. It was, after all, the Great Helmsman who instituted the largest-scale pogroms against dissidents and free-thinkers – the Anti-Rightist Movement (ARM) – in the 1950s. Deng Xiaoping was a key executor of the ARM crusade, and it was not surprising that when Deng rolled out the Four Cardinal Principles in the early 1980s to ensure that his economic reform would not spawn bourgeois-liberalisation, he again resorted to the Maoist tactic of imposing “the dictatorship of the proletariat” on oppositionists including Wei jingsheng, Guo Luoj, and Liu Binyan.

65. For a discussion of the CCP’s treatment of liberal party members such as Liu Binyan, Wang Ruoshui, and human rights activist, has thrown his support behind the de-Maoification of the arts and humanities.
The Hu leadership has in particular taken inspiration from the Maoist tradition of wufa wutian (“no law, no heavenly justice”) in hitting out at real and potential enemies of the regime. The years 2007 and 2008 marked a pronounced deterioration of the legal system as the Party’s zhengfa wei or Central Commission on Legal and Political Affairs (CCPLA), was given more authority than ever to closely supervise the operations of judges and lawyers. Hu pointed out at a national conference on legal and judicial matters in late 2007 that the foremost task of judges and law-enforcement cadres was to “uphold party leadership” and to “serve the party’s interests.” The Party chief also mentioned goals such as “serving the people” and “safeguarding the sanctity of the Constitution and the law”; but these two objectives paled beside that of sub-serving the CCP.\(^{(66)}\)

In March 2008, Wang Shengjun, a former police officer and CCPLA bureaucrat who does not have a law degree, was appointed President of the Supreme People’s Court, China’s equivalent of Chief Justice. Ridiculed as a famang (legal ignoramus) by liberal legal scholars, Wang has since urged the nation’s judges to fulfill political missions such as “promoting stability” and “ensuring social harmony.” Wang also called upon judges to “ensure the correct political direction of the people’s courts” and to rally behind the leadership of the “Party central authorities with comrade Hu Jintao as general secretary.”\(^{(67)}\) It is interesting that in his talks to judges, Wang has often admonished them to “deeply study the two major theoretical systems’ of Mao Zedong Thought and socialism with Chinese characteristics.” Like other senior cadres, the chief justice likes to engage in “red tourism.”

While visiting the “revolutionary mecca” of Ruijin, Jiangxi Province, in 2010, Wang praised the contributions of the CCP founders such as Mao, Zhu De, and Zhou Enlai: “Ruijin is the cradle of the People’s Republic of China,” he said. “It is also the Wellspring of people’s justice, as well as the root of the people’s courts.”\(^{(68)}\)

It is also significant that princeling Bo was subjected to repeated attacks by liberal lawyers and law professors for imposing “rough justice” on Chongqing. In the course of his anti-triad campaign, then-Party secretary Bo was said to have put pressure on local judges to expedite convictions. Renowned defence attorney Li Zhuang, who acted for alleged triad boss Gong Gangmo, was convicted by the Chongqing court of perverting the course of justice. This caused such a big uproar in the Chinese legal community that Li was released unconditionally in 2011. The former Chongqing party boss was also accused of harassing residents who did not agree with his crypto-Maoist campaigns. For example, blogger Fang Hong, a 45-year-old retired forestry bureau official, was in early 2011 sent to reform-through-labour for daring to point out in his microblog that Bo had been manipulating the legal system for political ends.\(^{(69)}\)

---

How the Maoist revival helps strengthen the Gang of Princelings and the legitimacy of the “red aristocrats”

As with most political trends in China, the resuscitation of Maoist norms is intricately related to factional intrigue. Jockeying for position between the two major CCP cliques – the Gang of Princelings and the CYL Faction – has intensified in the run-up to the 18th CCP Congress. At this critical conclave slated for 2012, the Fourth-Generation leadership under President Hu and Premier Wen is due to yield power to the Fifth-Generation leadership, or cadres born in the late 1940s to mid-1950s. As we saw in earlier sections, Bo Xilai and Vice-President Xi Jinping, two prominent princelings, are among the most ardent architects of the quasi-Maoist renaissance. Implicit in the princelings’ re-hoisting of the Maoist flag is a veiled critique of the policies undertaken by Hu and his CYL Faction, which seem to have exacerbated the polarisation of rich and poor and spawned a kind of crass commercialism that runs counter to Maoist spiritual values.\(^{(70)}\)

Much more significantly, the princelings are using the Maoist crusade to lobby for more clout and authority in the polity. The political fortune of the Gang of Princelings suffered quite a blow during the first decade of the Era of Reform. Deng Xiaoping was against allowing too many princelings to monopolise Party and government posts. In the early 1980s, Deng reportedly indicated in an internal Party meeting that the proportion of taizidang Central Committee members should be limited. Instead of seeking a political career, princelings were encouraged to go into business.\(^{(71)}\) It was no accident that both of the patriarch’s sons, Deng Pufang and Deng Zhiheng, were successful if also controversial businessmen. The same goes for the children of Third- and Fourth-Generation leaders including Jiang Zemin, Zhu Rongji, Hu Jintao, and Wen Jiabao.\(^{(72)}\)

The political careers of many princelings were affected by Deng’s stricture. Bo, for example, did not get into the Central Committee until 2002, even though he had years earlier established himself as a formidable “warlord” in industrialised Liaoning Province. A number of high-profile princelings, including Xi Jinping, Wang Qishan (son-in-law of the late Vice-Premier Yao Yilin), and Deng Pufang made it into the Central Committee also at a relatively late stage of their careers. The trio were first elected into the Central Committee in 1997 as alternate, or second-tier and non-voting, members. Moreover, Xi got the least – and Deng and Wang respectively the second and seventh lowest – number of votes among the 151 alternate members.\(^{(73)}\) By the 2000s, however, the princelings had made a strong comeback. Bo’s fairly successful Maoist campaign was widely seen as a Machiavellian manoeuvre to enable him to secure a slot on the new PBSC that will be established at the 18th Party Congress. Wang, who became Vice-

---

\(^{(70)}\) For a discussion of the internecine bickering between the Gang of Princelings and Hu Jintao’s Communist Youth League Faction, see, for example, Qiu Xiaolong, “Bo Xilai’s campaign of hitting the triads and singing red songs has led to a schism within the CCP leadership,” Frontline monthly (Hong Kong), September 2011.

\(^{(71)}\) For a discussion of Deng Xiaoping’s views toward the princelings, see, for example, Qin Hui, “On certain questions about the Cultural Revolution,” China-Review.com, 19 January 2011 (accessible on 3 March 2012 at http://blog.reniem.com/share/237211801/6843594490).

Premier in March 2008, is heavily tipped to get into the PBSC at this crucial congress. (74)

Moreover, the princelings’ clout is particularly pronounced within the People’s Liberation Army. Several dozen major-generals, lieutenant-generals, and full generals boast distinguished pedigrees. The following princeling generals are considered to have a high chance of making the policy-setting Central Military Commission that will be formed at the 18th Party Congress: Air Force Commander Xu Qiliang, Deputy Chief of General Staff Ma Xiaotian, General Logistics Department Political Commissar Liu Yuan, Political Commissar of the Second Artillery Corps Zhang Haiyang, and Shenyang Military Region Commander Zhang Youxia. (75)

The princelings are cunningly using the Maoist-restitution drive to further exploit their advantage of illustrious lineage. After all, as the famous Chinese proverb goes: “He who has won heaven and earth has the right to be their rulers.” This was the basis of the “revolutionary legitimacy” of the First- and Second-Generation leadership under Mao and Deng respectively. As the sons and daughters of Long March veterans, princelings regard their “revolutionary bloodline” as a prime political resource. (76) Thus, while visiting the “revolutionary mecca” of Jinggangshan in Jiangxi Province in 2008, Xi paid homage to the “countless martyrs of the revolution who used their blood and lives to win over this country.” “They laid a strong foundation for the good livelihood [we are enjoying],” he said. “Under no circumstances can we forsake this tradition.” (77) Similarly, while marking National Day on 1 October 2008, Bo urged Chongqing’s cadres “to forever bear in mind the ideals and hot-blooded [devotion] of our elders.” “Forsaking [their revolutionary tradition] is tantamount to betrayal,” Bo instructed. (78)

It is also not surprising that the military offspring of Party elders and Long March-generation generals have since 2010 been a strong force behind the changhong movement. Take, for instance, the high-powered group called “Singing Troupe of 100 Offspring of Generals.” Senior members of the troupe include the sons and daughters of Marshals Chen Ye, Nie Rongjin, Luo Rongheng and He Long, respectively Chen Haosu, Nie Li, Luo Dongjin, and He Xiaomin. (79) Owing to the aura of respectability attached to their fathers, these military taizidang felt a sense of pride in singing “revolutionary songs,” many of which were associated with the Great Helmsman. Like their civilian counterparts such as Xi Jinping, military princelings want to play up the symbolic value of their pedigree – and their fitness to play a major role in Chinese military and political affairs. (80)

Is the ouster of Bo an indication of the end of the Maoist campaign?

Things began to fall apart for Bo Xilai before Chinese New Year in January 2012, an intriguing course of events that led to the “suspension” of his Politburo membership in April. Given that Beijing has been reluctant to release critical evidence regarding this mammoth case, the following account has been pieced together from reports from the foreign and Hong Kong press – as well as other credible sources in Beijing. Bo the regional “warlord” began to fall out with one of his closest aides, then-Chongqing vice-mayor and head of public security Wang Lijun. Wang, known as a “national anti-triad hero” for his role in smashing triad gangs, told his boss he was investigating Bo’s wife, the power lawyer Gu Kailai, for possible involvement in the death of British businessman Neil Heywood. Bo was so mad that he relieved Wang of his police duties and instead put the vice-mayor in charge of higher education and the environment. (81) Seeing the writing on the wall, Wang, who is believed to also have been under investigation for corruption offences during the long years that he served in Liaoning Province, tried to seek political asylum at the Chengdu US Consulate General on 6 February. One day later, Wang emerged from the consulate and was taken to Beijing by senior officials from the Ministry of State Security.

At least publicly, Bo seemed unfazed. He attended the annual National People’s Congress that opened on 5 March. At an NPC press conference, the princeling admitted that he had made the mistake of yongren bucha, or “hiring officials without careful consideration.” But he defended himself against innuendo that his wife and kin were involved in improper economic dealings. On 15 March, however, Xinhua announced in a terse statement that Bo had been relieved of his duties as Chongqing Party Secretary. And on 10 April, the Party leadership suspended Bo of his Politburo and Central Committee membership on account of “serious discipline violations.” Xinhua reported that Gu was complicit in Heywood’s death. Beijing was awash with rumours that Bo was hatching a plot against Hu and Xi Jinping, who is due to take over the post of Party General Secretary at the 18th CCP Congress. (82)

The main factor behind Bo’s ouster seemed to be the animosity between the ultra-ambitious princeling on the one hand, and Hu jinping and Wen Jiabao on the other. There was also a bitter power struggle between the Gang of Princelings and the CYL Faction. Of the nine PBSC members, only Hu has not visited Chongqing since Bo was transferred there in late 2007. Premier Wen was briefly in the metropolis in December 2008 – mainly to assess the impact of the global financial crisis on western China. But he said nothing about the anti-triad or the changhong movements that Bo had just

75. For a discussion of the princelings in the PLA, see, for example, Willy Lam, “The power of Xi Jinping has become consolidated,” Apple Daily, Hong Kong, 24 August 2011.

76. For a discussion of the rise of cadres with “revolutionary bloodlines,” see, for example, Chen Pofuk, “The CCP has elevated a large number of princelings,” www.chinesepen.org, 9 December 2007, www.chinesepen.org/Article/Huzy200712/article_200712092010450.html (consulted on 3 March 2012).

80. For a discussion of the “military princelings,” see, for example, Lin Hei, “Factors behind Xi Jinping’s consolidation of power,” Apple Daily, 24 August 2011.

81. For an account of the activities of the Singing Troupe of 100 Offspring of Generals, see, for example, “Offspring of the generals sing red songs; their enthusiasm spreads throughout the land,” Daifhong Daily (Shandong), 26 June 2010, www.dzwww.com/shandong/sdnews/201006/t20100627_569923.htm (consulted on 3 March 2012).

82. For a discussion of the “military princelings,” see, for example, Lin Hei, “Factors behind Xi Jinping’s consolidation of power,” Apple Daily, 24 August 2011.

launched. (83) As we saw in the above sections, while there were major differences between the philosophies and ideology of Bo and Wen, Bo’s crypto-Maoist ideals and statecraft were not significantly different from those of either Hu or other BPSC members such as Xi Jinping, Li Changchun, or Zhou Yongkang. It thus seems evident that Bo’s disgrace will not necessarily mean the end of either the “Chongqing model” or the Maoism movement.

It is true that at Wen’s penultimate NPC international press conference just one day before Bo’s dismissal as Chongqing chief, the liberal premier indirectly criticised Bo by warning against “a return of the Cultural Revolution.” In his meeting with veteran Hong Kong-based NPC member Wu Kangmin in 2011, Wen also decried the possible resuscitation of “the remnant poison” of the Cultural Revolution. (84) Immediately after Bo’s downfall, there were signs that the Party leadership was reining in the crypto-Maoist excesses associated with Bo and the Chongqing model. For example, several websites that used to sing the praises of Bo’s ideas – wyzxx.com and Redflag.net – were closed down for “maintenance.” Yang Fan, an economics and politics professor at the China University of Politics and Law who had eulogised the Chongqing model, said he would have to take a second look at the track record of Bo and his associates. There was also speculation that Wen had taken advantage of Bo’s political demise to push for his long-time goal of changing the official verdict of the 1989 pro-democracy student movement. (85)

However, it was evident that the bulk of the political manoeuvres and ideological campaigns undertaken by the Hu leadership in the wake of the Wang Lijun and Bo Xilai incidents were geared toward upholding stability and political conformism among civilian and military officials. Apart from the Mao-oriented websites, a large number of liberal blogs and websites were put out of action. Several Netzizens were arrested for “spreading rumours” on the information superhighways. Cyberpolice departments also launched a nationwide campaign to clear the Net of criminal and politically incorrect elements. The treatment of dissidents and human rights activists including Ai Weiwei, Gao Zhisheng, and Chen Guangcheng remained extremely harsh. Chen was forced to seek refuge in the American Embassy in Beijing in late April. (86) A number of Chinese intellectuals saw Bo’s political demise as a vindication of Premier Wen’s advocacy of reform – and a possible harbinger of some form of political loosening up to come in 2013. For example, Wang Kang, a Chongqing-based scholar and documentary filmmaker, said that “Bo’s ouster marks a turning point in China’s history and gives China an opportunity.” Yet Wang was clear-headed enough to note that the victory scored by the likes of Wen was “still very fragile.” Other intellectuals are less sanguine about what Bo’s fall may portend. For example, Wu Si, a famous public intellectual associated with the liberal journal Yanhuang Chunqiu, told the foreign media he was disappointed that the Bo in-

84. For a description of Wen’s attitude toward the Chongqing affair and the Cultural Revolution, see, for example, Jamil Anderlini, “Wen lays ground for Tiananmen healing,” Financial Times, 20 March 2011, www.ft.com/intl/cms/s/0/0f713cd2-7285-11e1-9eb6-00144efeb99a.html#atm=cmp%20linked%20links%20/1/1a605f4w (consulted on 3 March 2012).
85. See Shi Jiangtao, “Maoist sites closed over Bo Support,” South China Morning Post, 7 April 2012; Author’s telephone interview with Yang Fan, 8 April 2012.
88. For a description of a typical Lei Feng spiritual campaign, see, for example, Feng Chunmei, “Going along with the spirit of Lei Feng,” People’s Daily, 22 March 2012, http://military.people.com.cn/ GB117453870.html (consulted on 3 March 2012).
89. Cited in Lizhuang, The 1989 pro-democracy student movement was the Campaign to Learn from Lei Feng that was organised in different provinces and PLA units. (88) “Proletariat paragon” Lei Feng was lionised by Mao Zedong in the 1950s for his unreserved fealty to the Party central authorities. For example, in a speech marking the Learn From Lei Feng Campaign in Hunan Province, Party Secretary Zhou Qiang pointed out that “the Lei Feng spirit has clear-cut contemporary traits.” The Lei Feng spirit will never become obsolete; it is eternal in nature,” said Zhou, a notable Sixth-Generation tuanpai politician who is rumoured to be a post-18th Congress candidate for the post of Chongqing party boss. (89)
90. Cited in “Senior PLA officers issue the demand of ‘taking over the gun of Lei Feng’,” Wen Wei Po (Hong Kong), 18 March 2012, http://news.wenweipo.com/2012/03/18/IN1203180002.htm (consulted on 3 March 2012).
in the Party’s theoretical journal Seeking Truth. The “crown prince” called upon officials to “safeguard the purity of the party.” “We must resolutely stop and combat any wrong political tendencies that veer from the party’s basic lines,” he indicated. “Leading cadres must resolutely uphold the Party’s principles, charter, goals, and policies.” (93) There seems little doubt that these homilies were issued to rein in centrifugal tendencies exposed by the Bo Xilai affair.

The powers-that-be, then, did not seem to realise that the Bo affair – including rumours that he was contemplating the moral equivalent of a coup d’état against the Hu-Wen leadership – was a testimony of the Maoist elements in CCP politics, particularly the rule of personality. It seems clear that the only way to prevent a recurrence of the Bo disaster – as well as the Cultural Revolution – was to press ahead boldly with real political reform. It is therefore unfortunate that the reaction of the Hu leadership was to put an even tighter squeeze on liberalisation, including the possibility of a higher degree of free thinking among cadres and intellectuals.

Conclusion: Preserving the status quo at all cost

For many intellectuals, changhong and other manifestations of the Maoist resurgence are a contradiction in terms. As He Bing, a top law professor at the China University of Political Science and Law put it: “In this absurd time, they encourage you to sing revolutionary songs, but they do not encourage you to wage a revolution.” For Renmin University political scientist Zhang Ming, the ditties featured in changhong performances could at most be called “pink songs.” “Red songs are mostly about revolution and violence,” he said. “Now they only use red songs to praise the Party and Party members; so it’s pointless.” (94)

Indeed, the Maoist revival says much about the CCP’s top priority of preserving the status quo, especially its status as “perennial ruling party.” Beijing’s nervousness about the loss of yiyanhua – or “monolithic” – control over ideology and politics is fully reflected by the authorities’ elaborate studies of the reasons behind the fall of the USSR and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). Most mainstream theorists attribute the CPSU’s demise to Soviet leaders’ failure to preserve “purity of thought” by sticking to Marxism and Stalinism. Senior ideologue Zhang Quanjing said it well when he put the blame of the CPSU’s collapse on de-Stalinisation. “The first major reason behind the death of the CPSU is the negation of its leadership and negation of party history,” he said. Turning to China, Zhang indicated: “Since the era of reform, the West has sped up the pace of Westernising and dividing up China. One of their main methods is to besmirch and vilify Mao Zedong.” (95) In the same vein, CASS Vice-President Li Shenming pointed out that the dissolution of the USSR stemmed from Soviet leaders’ “getting away from and eventual betrayal of Marxism and socialism.” (96) Moreover, Li asserted, the Soviet state-security apparatus failed to put the lid on dissent. The ideologue fingered three forces as playing a pivotal role in chipping away at the CPSU’s authority: underground publications, dissidents, and NGOs. (97) As discussed above, the resuscitation of Maoist practices has served the purpose of promoting the uniformity of thought – and weeding out dissenters as well as bourgeois-liberal intellectuals and organisations.

While it is not the purpose of this paper to discuss China’s future policies, it is probable that the Hu Jintao – and Xi Jinping – leadership’s obsession with preserving the CCP’s monopoly on power could leave them ill-disposed and ill-equipped to rekindle those economic, administrative, and political reforms that have been put on the back burner for the past couple of decades. As pointed out in an earlier section, Xi, who will be the PBSC member in charge of the CCP’s overall ideological orientation, is a firm believer in the relevance and viability of Maoist thinking. Internationally, the financial and debt problems encountered by the US and the EU – and China’s “white knight” role in purchasing American and European bonds – will render the CCP even more confident of its long-standing policy of upholding one-party authoritarian rule. Pressure from abroad regarding the CCP’s human rights and related abuses is also set to decrease. The possibilities are reasonably high that Bo Xilai’s downfall notwithstanding, much of the restitution of Maoist norms will continue into the Xi Jinping era. While a kind of spring of democracy has swept through large swatches of the Middle East and North Africa since early 2011, the Middle Kingdom seems destined to be shrouded in deep winter for the foreseeable future.

1. Willy Lam is an Adjunct Professor in the History Department as well as in the Master’s Program in Global Political Economy of the Chinese University of Hong Kong. He is also an Adjunct Professor of China Studies at Akita International University, Japan.

95. Zhang Quanjing, artic.